

Grand Invocation of the Eniac Female Computers.

O spirits, I summon you,
to appear now by the power of the Great Name of Ada;
O spirits of Eniac Women,
I summon you;

May the sacred pages of the Syster Papyri Magicae reveal to me the knowledge and power of the Systems;
This day and always.

Eniac, the first all-electronic computer, was unveiled in 1946. The talented engineers J. Presper Eckert and John W. Mauchly who developed Eniac hardly worked alone. Six of the nearly 200 women who worked on the project as human "computers", were selected to program the machine. Their work was not recognised, nor known to the public until the mid-80s.
